GLOSSARY OF ACRONYMS AND ABBREVIATIONS.	88

United States military units assigned in the United Kingdom (UK) during World War II had to avoid any direct connection with specific geographic locations for security reasons. Most United States Army Air Forces (USAAF) units therefore identified their location with a "station number." Although each USAAF installation in the UK was named--generally after the nearest railway station--official correspondence and unit histories most often employed the station number.

Without access to an index of the various station numbers, the locations and units assigned in Great Britain are difficult to fathom, if they can be determined at all. Hence the need for a station listing to aid the researcher and historian. The Army Air Forces (AAF) numbers allocated to stations ranged from AAF-101 through AAF-925. But nothing is ever as simple as it might first appear. Not all AAF numbers were used, and not all installations had numbers (although the named ones are in the minority). Most of the stations appear in this listing, which is arranged sequentially, alphabetically, and by location. Nonetheless, more than 40 years later, it is impossible to identify accurately every UK facility occupied by the USAAF during World War II. The sources used to compile this list included numerous station lists prepared by the USAAF in England, Wales, Scotland, and Northern Ireland. These and other primary sources in the USAF Historical Research Center collection all date from late 1941 to late 1945.

BACKGROUND

Even with a number and name, finding a USAAF airfield in the United Kingdom during World War II was no easy matter. Although the UK is a small nation, a little smaller in size than the state of Oregon, its 94,214 square miles supported an inventory of USAAF airfields, depots, and installations that numbered in the hundreds at war's end. However small the territory, for young American pilots newly arrived from the midwest and used to training in the blue skies over Texas, it was easy to get lost. England was (and still is) a patchwork of fields, towns, and villages, all looking remarkably similar from the air. And for aircrew members accustomed to using a single crossroads or country church as a landmark, accurate navigation became crucial. Even on the ground, crewmen travelling from place to place could find navigating difficult for in 1940, when a German invasion appeared imminent, the British had removed practically all the road signs and mile markers. Indeed, navigation became such a problem that a special "Pathfinder" school was established at RAF* Alconbury (AAF-102), Huntingdonshire. Many navigators found themselves on orders for AAF-102 to learn the mysteries of British H2S radio navigation gear from experts of the 482d Bombardment Group. If one did find a newly constructed USAAF airfield, security procedures required that it be referred to in orders and on other travel documents by AAF number.

*During World War II, each USAAF-occupied airfield was prefixed by the term "Royal Air Force Station." Abbreviated to "RAF," this policy (with some exceptions) has remained in effect until the present. Thus, references to Alconbury Air Base, or Alconbury Field, are technically incorrect.

Huntingdonshire and several other English counties "disappeared" during a postwar local government reorganization. The area formerly known as "Huntingdonshire" was amalgamated into Cambridgeshire. In this study, the county locations given are those extant in 1942-1945.

Several variations of the basic AAF station numbering system were in use at different UK headquarters. Some fighter units prefixed the number with an "F," leaving out the "AA." RAF Duxford, headquarters for the 66th Fighter Wing and 78th and 350th Fighter Groups, was known as F-357. Eventually the list of AAF numbers grew to include a small number of installations outside the British Isles. There were four U.S.-occupied airfields in Iceland during the war--one of these designated AAF-354.* It was home for the 14th Fighter Group and the 50th Fighter Squadron.

Similarly, after the 6 June 1944 landings in Normandy, Ninth Air Force units and headquarters began moving rapidly to the Continent. Some Dutch, Belgian, and French bases were also assigned AAF numbers. The expansion of USAAF airfields was so rapid, however, that the USAAF devised a series of new numbering systems, and some of the previously designated bases in Europe also acquired numbers with A-, B-, or Y- prefixes: Chievres (AAF-181), Belgium, was also A-84; Merville, France, sported the dual designation AAF-182 and B-53.

Further east, on the Russian Front, United States Strategic Air Forces in Europe established its eastern headquarters at Poltava, near Kiev in the USSR. Poltava (AAF-559) was one of three Ukraine installations operated

*Station lists are not specific, but there were four airfields used by the AAF in Iceland. Reykyavik, the main tactical field, was under RAF jurisdiction and was not used extensively by the USAAF. But the United States constructed Meeks and Patterson Fields at Reykyavik, as well as Kassos Field on the north side of the island. Meeks and Patterson were developed jointly as major staging points on one of the important air transport routes to Europe.

in the Soviet Union by Headquarters, Eastern Command. The others were established at Piryatin (AAF-560) and Mirgorod (AAF-561).

AIRFIELD CONSTRUCTION

U.S. Secretary of State Cordell Hull and Viscount Halifax* met in the summer of 1942 and on 3 September agreed to USAAF operations from the United Kingdom. Under terms of the reciprocal aid pact, the agreement called for the British to supply all the facilities necessary for the USAAF. But labor shortages in Britain and the need to get airfields built as quickly as possible led to the use of U.S. aviation engineers. No charge was made for their use, since the labor was considered "training." In fact, American engineers became a vital element in a severely stretched British construction program. In February 1945 another agreement made the British government responsible for all capital expenditures on airfields constructed for or improved by the USAAF.¹

By the end of 1942, USAAF leaders chose to build large bases, each large enough to accommodate a complete combat group so that each combat unit might have its own service group assigned.² Earlier, VIII Bomber Command planned to divide its forces into five wing areas, each composed of 15 airfields. The bulk of these installations at the time were in use by RAF Bomber Command, but none were large enough to accommodate an entire U.S. heavy bombardment group.

British planners--and their U.S. counterparts--assumed that each group in VIII Bomber Command would station a squadron of bomber aircraft at its main base with attendant service facilities, and then use satellite stations for the remainder of the group's squadrons within the wing area. But by November 1942 British and American military leaders realized that the USAAF effort in the UK was increasing so rapidly that it would be more productive to build or enlarge airfields to accommodate a whole group, rather than separate the squadrons as each RAF wing* did. Both fighter and bomber units were stationed in the same general areas, resulting in heavy concentrations of USAAF stations, personnel, and aircraft in East Anglia, the Midlands, and the West Country.

As the air war progressed, aerial priorities changed and the Eighth Air Force gave up those bases programmed for its use in the 5th Wing area northeast of London, predominantly in Essex. Among the airfields planned, but not built for USAAF use, were facilities at Ingatestone, Maldon, Southminster, Burnham-on-Crouch, and High Roding. In 1943 Lt Gen Ira Eaker returned the area to RAF Bomber Command and concentrated his bomber forces among the East Anglian bases.³

Of the more than 140 United Kingdom airfields constructed or improved by or for the USAAF, Air Transport Command occupied 7, and Eighth and Ninth Air Forces occupied the others. Twelfth and Fifteenth Air Forces both fielded units in the UK, but in 1943 moved their operations to the North African and Mediterranean theaters. But until construction was completed on the majority of airfields, American units used RAF stations on a "joint use," or "lodger" basis. Such airfields included Ashchurch, Bisterne, Headcorn, High Halden, Kingsnorth, Lashenden, Lymington, Staplehurst, Williamstrip, Winkton, and Woodchurch. USAAF use of these stations usually predated 1944, although USAAF aircraft would land at RAF fields in emergency situations.

*The echelons of the Royal Air Force, in order of ascending size, were squadron, wing, and group, whereas the USAAF used the designations squadron, group, and wing. This also explains the rationale behind the RAF system of officer ranks: squadron leader, wing commander, and group captain, respectively; each equivalent in rank to major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel in the USAAF.

Airfield construction can be divided between a small number built by U.S. engineers and a greater number constructed by the British. American aviation engineering battalions built Andrews Field (Great Saline), Birch, Boreham, Chipping Ongar, Debach, Eye, Glatton, Gosfield, Great Dunmow, Harrington, Matching, Nuthamstead, Raydon, and Stansted (Mountfichet). Harrington was constructed for the RAF in exchange for Little Staughton, built by the British for the USAAF. (Figure 1 illustrates the typical airdrome layout approved by the Engineering Section of VIII Air Force Service Command in March 1943.) By 1 June 1943, the Air Ministry had 54 bomber aerodromes under construction for the USAAF, in addition to the 13 just mentioned. Construction of fighter fields was also underway, and the British allocated 10 of a total of 22 for exclusive U.S. use, with the remainder designated as emergency landing fields. Six combat crew replacement centers, the photo reconnaissance base at Mount Farm (AAF-234), and another 19 observation and transport fields also took shape rapidly amid the British landscape. Apart from this massive airfield construction program, the USAAF also took over numerous RAF stations. Some of these sorely needed stations the RAF wanted to keep but were nonetheless surrendered to the USAAF. Referring to this spirit of generosity between allies, General Eaker, Eighth Air Force commander, observed: "The British . . . have cooperated 100 percent in every regard. We are extremely proud of the relations we have been able to establish [with] our British Allies"4

The facilities at former RAF fields ranged from excellent to primitive. Each came supplied with a liaison officer, British communications equipment, and civil engineering staff.* This helped ease the transition from state-side training to a war operations footing for newly arrived combat groups. Some fields, part of the pre-war RAF establishment, boasted barracks and hangars, machine shops, and supply dumps; but most of the others amounted simply to a concrete runway or a grass strip "improved" with the addition of pierced steel planking and the erection of tents and Nissen huts. None of the newly acquired airfields could be considered spacious by U.S. standards of the day.

The complex of air bases across the middle of England was a vast one, and a huge logistical "tail" had to support the Eighth and Ninth Air Forces' "teeth." In March 1942 General Eaker pushed for establishment of the depot, repair, and overhaul facilities needed for sustained flying operations from the UK. Warton (AAF-582), 25 miles north of Liverpool in Lancashire, had been identified as an excellent site for this purpose by a group of Air Corps officers during a visit to the Blackpool and Preston areas on

*Today, each USAF installation in the UK still has an RAF station commander--usually a squadron leader--assigned, as well as civil engineers from the Property Services Agency of the British Department of the Environment.

Nissen huts resembled a corrugated metal barrel cut lengthwise and bolted to a concrete base. These were used on most UK airfields in World War II.

27-28 October 1941,⁵ before the United States entered the war. During the same trip to survey British flying operations, the group visited the Huntingdon area. Airfields at Polebrook, Grafton Underwood, Kimbolton, Little Staughton, Molesworth,* Chelveston,* Podington, and Thurleigh--all to become famous bomber installations--were also identified as desirable. Warton was exceptionally well sited with regard to essential services, and with Burtonwood became one of the key USAAF logistical facilities in the United Kingdom.

In 1943 the conversion of British sites to USAAF facilities quickened. Wycombe Abbey, a girls school near RAF Bomber Command headquarters, became Headquarters Eighth Air Force at High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire. Silcock's Warehouse, Liverpool, transformed from grain storage to become an aircraft spares warehouse. Various country houses became other USAAF headquarters-- Bushey Hall at Watford, on the northwest side of London, and Lord Iveagh's home at Elveden Hall, Suffolk, are examples. Other houses large and small accommodated the surge of USAAF personnel, personnel sometimes referred to caustically as "over paid, over sexed, and over here!" But the need for still more personnel replacements grew as USAAF forces and facilities expanded, the air war intensified, and aircrew losses mounted. Any initial British resentment at the local level was soon replaced by admiration and even affection for the Yanks who flew bomber raids against Nazi Germany in the broad daylight.* Thousands of airmen passed through the replacement control depots at Stone (AAF-518 and AAF-594) in Staffordshire, which served the VIII Air Force Service Command, and Chorley (AAF-591) in Lancashire, from which IX Air Force Service Command drew replacements for Ninth Air Force units.

But it wasn't just people that kept the USAAF flying--it was also the spare parts, rubber tires, fuel, lubricants, ammunition, bombs, and all the other vital supplies that flowed off the docks in Liverpool into and through the Service Command supply depots. Burtonwood in Warrington became the principal Base Air Depot Area headquarters for the UK, and developed into the largest single U.S. supply, storage, and maintenance installation of the war. As the number of combat airfields grew, so did the entire depot complex, with Strategic Air Depot areas, Tactical Air Depot areas (also known as Advanced Air Depots), and Base Air Depot Areas all serving sections of the USAAF. Langford Lodge (AAF-597), Northern Ireland, developed rapidly as a supply and maintenance depot. Other facilities in Northern Ireland served important roles as training locations for newly arrived aircrews. Geographically, Ulster was somewhat sheltered from Luftwaffe air raids because of its distance from the Continent and because England offered more tempting targets.

Combat Crew Replacement Centers established in Northern Ireland included the facilities at Eglinton (AAF-344), Toome (AAF-236), Cluntoe

*Some authorities suggest that daylight raids were chosen because the navigation skills among U.S. aircrews were insufficient to handle nighttime operations without extensive additional training.

(AAF-238), Nutts Corner (AAF-235), Long Kesh (AAF-232), Maghaberry (AAF-239), and Greencastle (AAF-237)--all built or improved for the USAAF. Others in the Eighth Air Force Ulster construction program on 28 July 1942 included the satellite fields at Ballyhalbert, Bishop's Court, Mill Isle,* Kirkistown,* Sydenham, Newtownards, Mullaghmore, and Maydown. A combat crew replacement center and advanced supply and repair depot was planned at St. Angelo--the facility furthest west in Northern Ireland--but records do not confirm any actual USAAF use. The Eighth Air Force stationed a signal battalion at Lurgan (AAF-350), and occupied facilities at Victoria Barracks, Belfast (AAF-233), and Kircassock House (AAF-231). Ninth Air Force operated Aldergrove (AAF-439) in County Antrim, Northern Ireland, which had served in 1940 as the terminus for the North Atlantic ferry route from the United States. (Luftwaffe attacks in late 1940 forced the use of Prestwick (AAF-500), Scotland, for this purpose in place of Aldergrove.)

UNIT MOVES

In late 1943, men and materiel were flowing into the UK at a tremendous rate. The rapid expansion of USAAF bases meant that any unit remaining at one station throughout the war would be an exceptional case indeed. Therefore, though the station listing generally identifies a particular unit with a station number and location, that unit is the one most closely associated with that location during the war years. It was not necessarily the final location of the unit at war's end. Because units often moved, some are identified with more than one station number and location. In at least one case, a station number moved. (See the note associated with Hitcham [AAF-470], Suffolk.) In other cases, there appears to have been considerable confusion even among members of allied wartime headquarters staffs about certain stations and their corresponding station numbers, especially when two stations were collocated. This most often occurred when depots were established adjacent to flying units. In Norfolk, the station numbers for Watton (AAF-376) and Neaton (AAF-505) were often used interchangeably. Honington (AAF-375), Suffolk, was frequently listed as AAF-595, the station number for Troston.

*Built as reciprocal aid projects, but never used by the USAAF.

In addition to names, some key units were referred to by their code names.* Headquarters, Eighth Air Force and its successor, United States Strategic Air Forces in Europe (USSTAFE), headquartered in the suburbs southwest of London at Bushey Park, Teddington, were dubbed "WIDEWING." Headquarters, VIII Bomber Command at High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire, was code named "PINETREE." To add to the plethora of names, High Wycombe (AAF-101) is also referred to as Camp Lynn. Several other installations also bore the "Camp" prefix. Camp Blainey, headquarters for the Eighth Air Force's Third Air Division, became better known by its original name--Elveden Hall (AAF-116). Similarly, Camp Thomas (AAF-108) in Norfolk quickly regained its local name of Old Catton. But Camp Griffiths (AAF-586), an alternative name for the headquarters at Bushey Park, proved the exception and retained its designation throughout the war.

USAAF headquarters spread throughout London and its suburbs. Sometimes they were given station numbers; sometimes not. Kew Gardens was one such site, just south of the Thames. Others were near the U.S. Embassy--AAF-576 is listed as 20 North Audley Street, just off Grosvenor Square. Another London example: AAF-405--Elsworth Road and Wadham Gardens in St. Johns Wood. Both are listed as being in Hampstead Borough* where the IX Air Defense Command had its headquarters. Yet another London station was Bryanston Square (AAF-390), which became the U.S. Strategic Air Forces in Europe rear echelon headquarters when the USSTAFE moved to the Continent.

By 1944, as U.S. forces in the UK reached their greatest numbers in preparation for the Normandy invasion, U.S. installations seemingly had sprung up everywhere. Although Figure 2 shows many of these airfields, it is by no means comprehensive. Army Air Forces unit commanders found themselves jockeying for precious space with the RAF, the United States and British Armies, and even with Navy units. Military planners began to blur the distinction between U.S. Army and U.S. Army Air Forces components. The U.S. Army ordnance facility at Tidworth, Buckinghamshire, was assigned the designation AAF-583. Other station lists placed AAF-583 at Sharnbrook, Bedfordshire, which was a USAAF ordnance and chemical depot. Another ordnance and chemical depot, Barnham in Suffolk, carried two station numbers despite its small size. Barnham's Warren Wood site was listed as AAF-587 and its nearby Little Heath site became AAF-517. (As late as 1971, RAF Barnham was being used by the U.S. Air Force to billet airmen assigned to nearby RAF Lakenheath.)

*The Borough of Hampstead. British usage in 1943 was just as confusing to Americans then as it can be today, hence some of the designations that became common parlance in American headquarters were actually incorrect interpretations of British placenames.

THEN AND NOW

Though this station list provides basic information for each station, normally only combat flying units have been listed unless the primary USAAF unit assigned was a non-flying organization. The typical USAAF station included a fighter or bomber group and a service organization.* RAF Alconbury, known as AAF-102 at the time, is the only major World War II facility still operated by the U.S. Air Force. It is therefore interesting to compare its station complement on 29 February 1944 with the one assigned some 40 years later. Alconbury, then an Eighth Air Force station, was assigned to the 1st Bombardment Division. The principal flying unit was the 482d Bombardment Group, which was responsible for Eighth Air Force "Pathfinder" training. (Because of this special responsibility, the 482d was also regarded as part of the VIII Composite Command, which controlled all advanced combat training for the Eighth Air Force in 1944.) The 1st Bombardment Division--with headquarters nearby at Brampton Grange (AAF-103)--was represented at Alconbury by Detachment A of its Headquarters and Headquarters Squadron. Detachment 102 of the 18th Weather Squadron† was also located at Alconbury, as was Sub Depot 440 of the VIII Strategic Air Depot area that provided maintenance support. Elements of the 482d Bombardment Group included a headquarters and headquarters squadron, and the 812th, 813th, and 814th Bombardment Squadrons. Attached to the 482d was the 36th Bombardment Squadron. The 41st Station Complement Squadron provided service functions, and the 1203d Quartermaster Company had supply responsibility. Bombs and ammunition were stored in revetments on the north side of the field by members of the 1645th Ordnance Supply and Maintenance Company. The 1251st Military Police Company (Aviation) provided security. All military members of these units were paid by the finance officer and nine men of the 2960th Financial Detachment. This was no small task, because in February 1944 the 13 units and detachments stationed at RAF Alconbury possessed a military strength of 2,783.⁶

By comparison, 40 years later RAF Alconbury was a Third Air Force installation operated by the 10th Tactical Reconnaissance Wing. In addition to its two flying units, the 1st Tactical Reconnaissance Squadron and the 527th Aggressor Squadron,* the 10th TRW hosted the 17th Reconnaissance Wing. The 17th was an Eighth Air Force tenant organization at Alconbury, with one flying unit: the 95th Reconnaissance Squadron. Services were provided by the 10th Combat Support Group, which included four squadrons of its own. The 10th Transportation and Supply Squadrons provided logistical support, and six squadrons performed aircraft maintenance for the two wings. In addition to the 17th RW, the 10th TRW supported 14 tenant organizations, including a U.S. Army detachment. The 32 military organizations at RAF Alconbury in 1982 had a combined strength of 2,660.⁷

The similarity is remarkable, but it must be remembered that in 1944, as Figure 2 graphically illustrates, RAF Alconbury was one of hundreds of Eighth Air Force and Ninth Air Force installations at war against Germany. Some 40 years later RAF Alconbury had become one of only five major U.S. Air Force bases in the UK, supporting NATO. The role of American airpower in the UK is not forgotten, however, and U.S. service men and women in Great Britain today are welcome allies, sharing a bond forged in war. As Prime Minister Winston Churchill observed on learning of the attack on Pearl Harbor:⁸

No American will think it wrong of me if I proclaim that to have the United States at our side was to me the greatest joy. . . . So we had won after all! . . . England would live. Britain would live. How long the war would last or in what fashion it would end, no man could tell, nor did I at that moment care. . . . We should not be wiped out. Our history would not come to an end. Hitler's fate was sealed. Mussolini's fate was sealed. As for the Japanese, they would be ground to powder. All the rest was merely the proper application of overwhelming force. . . . No doubt it would take a long time . . . but there was no more doubt about the end.

At the time, even Churchill could hardly have guessed the magnitude of the U.S. military presence that would soon be stationed in the United Kingdom. The build up was phenomenal, with the island nation becoming "the world's largest aircraft carrier." The following station listing provides some idea of the scope of a part of that presence: the USAAF effort in Great Britain during World War II.

ARMY AIR FORCES STATION LIST

This listing is divided into three parts. Part 1, the numerical listing, includes all known station numbers. Part 2, the alphabetical listing, also includes installations that were not assigned AAF numbers. Part 3 indexes the alphabetical listing by geographic location, but does not include units assigned.

Explanation of terms:

AAF Number. The Army Air Forces station number assigned.

Name. The official name of the installation, with alternative names appearing in parentheses.

Location. Majority of locations are counties in England; locations outside England are identified by county (if available) and country.

Principal Unit(s). Unit(s) assigned to the installation during World War II. Space considerations preclude identifying every unit assigned, so flying units predominate. When no unit designation is available, the command--usually Eighth or Ninth Air Force--is given. Where information is unknown, it is so indicated. Explanation of abbreviations and acronyms used appear in the glossary.
